- The welcome page displays a navigation bar using `<nav>` and a nested unordered list of navigation links `` displayed inline. The navbar has a `:hover` function changing the color of the field.
- The color combinations of all the pages were hand picked from <https://colorhunt.co/palettes/brown>, a color palette site. The title is a combination of an `<h1>` and `<h2>` element. The main part has two `` sections containing an `<h2>` and a `` element: an introduction with some basic information and the purpose of this website, and contents with boxes of what the webpage has to offer. In the contents and also introduction, a `` link element is embedded which redirects the user to the corresponding page. They have a `:hover` function to change the text color when hovered over.
- The contents were created by making borders around an unordered list.
- The content inside the `` elements was positioned using CSS by changing the position to absolute and moving it with `up;`, `right;` etc.
- The page also contains a footer with my name as the author and my email, which when clicked directly pops up a mail window.

- The welcome page also contains a `<nav>` with an unordered list and `` elements.
- The title has also been created by an `<h1>` and `<h2>` element. For the design, I wanted the texts to be fun to look at, so I made borders around them and made them rounded by setting the border-radius.
- The body contains 5 `` elements, one for the title, three for the containers and one for the image. The containers include a bolded headline made bigger with CSS font-size and a main text with information about me and things i like. Everything was positioned using CSS with position and left, top, ... adjustments.
- The other section of the body is one of my favorite pictures which i embedded using the `` element. It is a picture of me and my father on our hike in Norway last year.
- The page also contains a footer with my name as the author and my email, which when clicked directly pops up a mail window.

- The CV also contains a <nav> with an unordered list and  elements.
- The title is made with an <h1> element and styled with CSS to be centered and colored.
- The CV is a combination of an and three  elements containing <h3> and <h4> elements and . The divs are surrounded with a border and they have been moved by position and left;, ... tags. I did not use a better method because at the time I made the CV page, we have not yet done flexbox and other useful elements.
- The main parts are: a brief introduction to who i am and what my skills are, then a section with some details, skills and language proficiencies and a second section with my experiences and history of studying. There is also an , a formal image of me before graduation.
- The page also contains a footer with my name as the author and my email, which when clicked directly pops up a mail window.

Gallery

- In the gallery, there is a navbar and the title is a `<h1>` element styled with CSS.
- Below, the gallery has 10 images. Each image has its own border, and the color of the border was picked to match the image. The borders are round using border radius specification.
- The whole gallery is also inside a border, which is dotted.
- All of the images are inside one ``, and each image has an alt: containing the description of the picture.
- The pictures are things i like and things i feel define me as a person. The first two images are my dog Argo, then a landscape picture from a hike in Norway, one of my favorite albums, favorite foods, a group picture with my teammates from mma and my favorite game and movies.

- The contact page has once again the nav bar, and the title is in a <section> element.
- The online inquiry is a <form> element, which contains a <fieldset>. I found these tags on w3schools, the link is in the comment in the code.
- The form is made up of <label> and <input> elements, taking the users answers.
- The last message window was made bigger using <textarea> and specifying the rows and columns. At the end there is a button to submit the form.
- The other part is a  with a white border around it. It contains the necessary information to get into contact with me if the person doesnt want to send an online inquiry. The design of the page was inspired by an image of a contact page I found on google from a company.
